Getty Villa drains fountains

Officials with the Getty Center and Getty Villa have decided to drain each museum's fountains in efforts to conserve water during the drought.

Getty officials report that roughly 2,500 gallons of water are conserved every day the fountains are not in use.

Signs around the water features advise visitors about California's drought and the steps the Getty has taken to help through not filling the water fountains.

Visitors have had mixed reactions about the removal of water from the features, but Getty spokesman Ron Hartwig told the LA Times, "the compliments outweigh the negative."

The Getty Villa is located just south of Malibu in Pacific Palisades and the Getty Museum is in Los Angeles.

Gov. Jerry Brown declared a drought state of emergency for California on January 17. According to the U.S. Drought Monitor, 33% of the state faces exceptional drought conditions, which has risen from 25% a week before. The State Water Resources Control Board reported water use in California was down 5% through May.

Annual Malibu Arts Festival approaches

The Malibu Chamber of Commerce will feature over 200 artists in front of the Malibu Civic Center at the 43rd annual Malibu Arts Festival on July 26-27 from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Painters, sculptors, photographers, jewelers and other unique artisans will showcase their work throughout the weekend with opportunities for visitors to meet with artists during the festival.

A pancake breakfast will be provided both mornings by The Optimist Club of Malibu from 8-11 a.m.

Children can create their own artwork at workshops hosted by Pepperdine University's Center for the Arts and the Malibu Library will have children's programming during the festival.

The festival will also have an entertainment stage with daily performances from local musicians and a food truck terrace offering menus to pique every palate.

In addition to the artists, Chamber of Commerce members will have the opportunity to promote their businesses and network with the community in the Chamber Village.

Admission is free and there is limited free parking. A lot adjacent to the festival site will offer $10 parking.
